

Ukraine: a major government reshuffle

Marcin Jędrysiak

On 5 September, Ukraine's parliament (Verkhovna Rada, VR) appointed 10 new ministers, including two deputy prime ministers (see Appendix 1). The previous day, six ministers and the head of the State Property Fund (SPF) had tendered their resignations, with one ministry being dissolved. Additionally, five other ministerial posts remained vacant for several months.

A major government reshuffle had been anticipated since March. However, contrary to widespread speculation, Prime Minister Denys Shmyhal remained in office. According to President Volodymyr Zelensky, the cabinet reshuffle was intended to bring "new energy" to the government ahead of what is expected to be a challenging autumn. In reality, however, the changes amounted to a series of personnel shifts. The primary aim seems to be to create the impression of a fresh start at a time when the organisation of parliamentary and presidential elections is not feasible (see 'President until the end of the war. Volodymyr Zelensky's term of office is extended').

Commentary

- The personnel reshuffle increases the government's reliance on the Office of the President of Ukraine (OPU), whose highly influential head Andriy Yermak, continues to consolidate power (see 'Zelensky, Yermak and Ukraine's wartime governance'). The newly-appointed ministers – Andriy Sybiha as Minister of Foreign Affairs, Oleksiy Kuleba as Minister of Regional Development and Infrastructure (and Deputy Prime Minister), and Mykola Tochytskyi as Minister of Culture and Information Policy – previously served as Yermak's deputies prior to their ministerial appointment (see Appendix 2). The dismissal of Dmytro Kuleba and the appointment of Sybiha is expected to strengthen the OPU's control over Ukraine's foreign policy. The outgoing Minister of Foreign Affairs had been in conflict with Yermak, while also maintaining strong personal relationships with Western partners and enjoying popularity among the Ukrainian public.
- No significant changes in the government's activities are anticipated, including in the realm of foreign policy. The reshuffle is unlikely to inject "new energy" into the cabinet, as the changes largely represent a rotation – essentially a transfer of individuals between ministries or from the OPU to the government. Furthermore, this indicates that the cadres available to the presidential camp are limited.
- The presidential centre of power is increasingly struggling to maintain control of the parliament and of the Servant of the People (SP) parliamentary group. This is evidenced by the disarray surrounding the VR's initial rejection of the resignations submitted by Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for the Reintegration of Temporarily Occupied Territories, Iryna Vereshchuk, and the head of the SPF, Vitaliy Koval. Their resignations were eventually accepted the following day, after a second vote. The appointment of each new minister required the support of opposition MPs, primarily from the Platform for Life and Peace parliamentary group, which stems from the delegatised pro-Russian Opposition Platform – For Life. Following his dismissal from his previous role, Koval was expected to be appointed as Minister of Agriculture. However, a faction within the SP parliamentary group was reluctant to approve his candidacy. Vereshchuk, on the other hand, opposed her dismissal as Deputy Prime Minister and received backing from some MPs regarding this matter. To resolve the impasse, a meeting was organised between the president and this parliamentary group to convince the Rada to accept the resignations of these two officials and to appoint new ministers the following day.

- Contrary to speculation, Deputy Prime Minister and Economy Minister Yulia Svyrydenko did not replace Denys Shmyhal as Ukraine’s Prime Minister. This may be attributed to an insufficient number of votes required to change the Prime Minister. Svyrydenko, who is closely associated with Andriy Yermak, could have further diminished the government’s remaining autonomy, a move opposed by some MPs within the Servants of the People party.
- In defence of Shmyhal, a legally questionable argument was raised, suggesting that the Martial Law Act prohibits the dismissal of the government in its entirety, which would occur if the Prime Minister were replaced. This is because the legal provision in question only prohibits curbing the competence of some bodies (such as the government), rather than making personnel reshuffles in these institutions.
- Energy Minister Herman Halushchenko has retained his position, despite accusations of incompetence in managing the sector during a significant electricity shortage. He has also been implicated in several corruption scandals, including the arrest of his deputy in August for accepting a $500,000 bribe. The decision not to dismiss him from this key ministry contradicts the presidential camp’s declarations regarding the need to bring “new energy” to the government and perpetuates a lack of transparency in this strategic sector.
- Halushchenko has retained his position in spite of a scandal involving his successful lobbying for the removal of Volodymyr Kudrytskyi, a highly respected official, as chairman of the management board of the Ukrenerho grid operator. Kudrytskyi was dismissed on 2 September. Unlike Enerhoatom (the state-controlled operator of nuclear power stations), Ukrenerho, whose CEO is an aide to Halushchenko, has never been the subject of journalistic investigations into irregularities regarding public procurement initiatives and has been highly regarded by Western donors. Kudrytskyi’s dismissal, which triggered the resignations of several Western experts from Ukrenerho’s supervisory board, was likely motivated by an effort to gain control over the company’s finances. In 2023, the company generated a profit of more than $1 bn, and since the onset of the full-scale war, it has received €1.5 bn in financial support from Western partners in the form of grants and low-interest loans.
